We're moving into a new house with a new schedule. There are new people in our lives, new responsibilities. The garden and the sewing room are taking up a great deal of my time. My birthday is a day I'm pretty much off. In fact, I'm not sure I really want to celebrate it. I just don't have the energy or the heart to schlep over to the coffee shop and make a mess of ordering creamer and a coffee. The day has lost all meaning. I don't think I've ever been the type of person who falls all over myself at the birthday or wedding of a friend. Never. And yet I was last night as I sat on the couch on my birthday, watching others celebrate it with their guests. And I was happy for them, too. It was a kind of private celebration, one in which, yes, I was feeling a little weepy. It was a kind of beautiful moment to be surrounded by people that were celebrating a big event in their lives. That's not at all the kind of thing I wish to be doing on my own birthday, but that's okay. I'm not one to regret a moment spent with others. It's the thought of death that leaves me feeling so sad on my birthday. And I'm not alone in that. Last week, I was leafing through a women's magazine at the library, and saw the following quote from David Sedaris, a man who, it must be said, has inspired me to go out and read a lot more. "I am deeply afraid of death," Sedaris wrote. "It seems that the older we get, the more we fear it. The great beast is creeping nearer by the minute. If we can't scare it away, the only consolation left is that, sooner or later, we're all going to be dead. The thing that makes me feel ashamed is 82157476af
